

MILTIADIS PAPANIKOLAOU

Professor emeritus of Art History, Aristotelian University of Thessaloniki

MARIA KOMPATSIARI: THE BYZANTINE LEAD SEALS

Throughout the history of art and civilization there have always been objects, largely utilitarian in nature, that serve everyday needs and are meant to facilitate the activities of members of a society with a heightened cultural awareness. These articles of manual labor and technology were crafted by talented men and women for a specific purpose and do not necessarily satisfy aesthetic criteria; they nonetheless express a certain view of the world and the citizen's relation to the power and role of the state.

Among such articles are the Byzantine lead seals or molyvdovoulath that were used to certify the authenticity of documents. These small objects are notable for the micrographic design of images and scenes which they can bear (engraved or embossed words and shapes). For archaeologists they provide insight into the history of institutions, the evolution of iconography and language, and in general the cultural level that prevailed in the vast Roman and Byzantine empires.

What, then, could a contemporary artist have in common with these humble seals, which are usually found in archaeological museums on the fringe of display cases dominated by works of high aesthetic and great inspiration?

Even if, by definition, all humanly fabricated objects are a part and facet of culture, there are nonetheless rules and procedures that define the extent to which an object of study possesses “aesthetic properties” sufficient to prompt the search to reveal a “deeper meaning”.

How did our artist “see” these objects as artworks of such value that she devoted time to “reshaping” them? What triggered her artistic interest and inspired a series of works created with contemporary notions of art?

Maria Kompatsiari has indeed spent considerable time preparing the works in this series, which at first brings us back to a distant past and its singular iconographic models and narrative.

Viewers will realize from the outset that they are confronted here with true works of art and that the Byzantine reference in the title is a pretext to render contemporary ideas; that the medieval symbols have been reshaped into abstractly inspired inner experiences; that the traditional iconography harbors personal musings on a range of standard themes; that the “mechanical” construction has been replaced by a manual one and sheer personal intervention (with the choice of material, the weaving, the threads and stitches); that a three-dimensional approach is fostered with the use of “foreign” materials but on the basis of a two-dimensional model within a predetermined frame; that the drawing is enriched with undecipherable hieroglyphic-like texts; that painting plays its own special role in realizing the works, that is, as objects that collaborate with sculpture on the basis of an architectural structure; that the decorative element gives a heightened chromatic feel to the works, relieving the images from the reigning monochromatism and austere palette; that design, geometric shapes and images, words and texts, arabesques and other morphic markings work in concert to enhance the expressiveness of the works; that the stitching and other interventions of the artist create a highly original and strikingly visual allusion to the mirinθοι,<sup>1</sup> the threads used to affix the seals to the documents they authenticated.

It is impressive to see an ancient subject with historic, cultural and factual references—and with an aesthetic dimension that escapes the contemporary viewer—transformed into an object of abstract art with visual coherence, one that functions as a kind of esoteric narrative that can be read as an illustrated romance story. A work, in the end, distinguished for its expressive richness and pluralism, thanks to the diverse permutations offered by inspiration, knowledge and technique.